February Health and Wellness Report

Shingles Increases Risk of Developing Later in Life Cognitive Decline

Alzheimer's Research & Therapy Journal

14 August 2024

Researchers analyzed health information from more than 149,000 middle-aged and older people that was followed for more than 14 years. Compared with those in the study who did not have shingles, those who did had a 20% higher risk of later developing what the study called subjective cognitive decline (SCD). They noticed that they were having trouble with remembering recent events, a short list of items, following instructions, recalling a short list of items, or recalling a plot of a TV show. People with SCD were greater risk of developing dementia. The risk was also found to be higher in those who had not been vaccinated against shingles.

Bottom Line: This study shows that vaccination against shingles may reduce the risk of developing shingles.
